Inspiring Impact

There's The Black American Tree Project—a collaborative, participatory, and immersive reconciliation performance and experience that explores slavery's effects on housing, the medical-industrial complex, prison system, education, and entertainment.

There's Belt Magazine, which shares deep and rich insights on life in the Midwest and whose Indigenous Rust Belt series has explored everything from Native American street food to why Indigenous place names matter.

And there's the Ukrainian Museum-Archives, whose work to preserve and share Ukrainian culture and the immigrant experience has provided incredible context and meaning through a tragic and challenging time.

These are just a few of the places and projects I've been introduced to during my first months leading Ohio Humanities. And with each additional leader, writer, and curator I meet, my passion for this work grows.

For 50 years, Ohio Humanities has supported storytellers statewide, from museums to journalists to documentary filmmakers. It's a legacy I am honored and excited to carry into the future, alongside a dynamite board and a talented team.

This organization has long proven its value. So when COVID hit, Ohio Humanities was entrusted by state and federal lawmakers to distribute additional dollars statewide to aide humanities organizations in continuing their work through an unprecedented time. Thanks to that financial support and partners like you, we awarded our most funds ever—over $2.4M. That's five times more than we typically give in a year. This funding helped non-profits maintain staffing and make important investments in technology and programming.

Because of that—because of you—hundreds of people are doing thoughtful and critical work to uplift stories, voices, and humanity in general.

Meanwhile, Ohio Humanities has been working to refine our own story. Here are three strategic highlights:

- 1 We've simplified our mission statement: Ohio Humanities shares stories to spark conversations and inspire ideas. And we crafted a new tagline—which is on this cover—to reflect that mission.
- 2 We are leaning into our rich history of documentary filmmaking with partnerships we are excited to announce later this year.
- 3 We are actively engaging younger audiences to excite the next generation about power of the humanities.

Your support is doing important work statewide, from elevating Black voices to helping erect a women's suffrage monument at the Ohio Statehouse. This report provides a snapshot of the impressive impact achieved in 2021. Thank you for helping us make it possible.

Blue

The Toledo Opera Association, with funding from Ohio Humanities, produced Blue—an opera that tells the story of a Black family as it reckons with the impact of police violence in their lives. The opera was awarded the prize for best new opera by the Music Critics Association of North America.

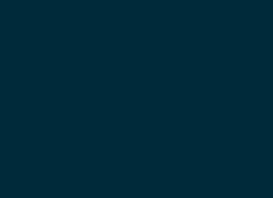

A Vibrant Appalachia

Ohio Humanities proudly supported humanities work throughout Ohio's Appalachian communities this year, where funds were in high demand and other sources were much less common than in larger cities. It funded myriad projects, from a walkable outdoor exhibit in an Athens park on the important role the humanities have played in the region's history to LatinX storytelling in Southern Ohio Folklife magazine.
